My mother was born in Barrouallie. Mentioned in a surprising 26 articles on the academic journal database JSTOR, the locale has primarily derived its import for scholars from the presence of whaling, Methodist Christianity, Caribs, and pre-Columbian petroglyphs.

Written here as "Prince's Bay or Barawally," the settlement's names and varied spellings make visible both the location's indigenous and contested colonial histories.

Engraved and printed by Thomas Jeffreys, the "Geographer to King George III," and published by Robert Sayer, this map's creation simultaneously reinscribed and attempted to erase the connections between this single speck of a remote seaside village, Caribbean indigeneity, and off-island world. Courtesy of the Boston Public Library via Wikimedia Commons.
